

Two-year ROTC plan

A two-year Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC) program is being added at Washington and Lee, it has been announced by Lt. Col. Jack Morris, professor of military science.

The two-year course will consist of a six-week summer training camp period to take the place of the usual two years' introductory courses in military science (101-2 and 201-2), he said.

The new program will provide a means for students to enter the ROTC program even if they did not attend Washington and Lee their first two years in college, and will enable law students—whose degrees are normally completed in three years—to participate in the program as well.

In the past, only the four-year ROTC program has been available at Washington and Lee.

In addition to the summer-camp period, ROTC students in the two-year program will be required to complete the usual advanced on-campus courses in military science, Col. Morris said.
